Thomas: Then and Now

Dear Doubting Thomas, a.k.a. Didymus:

You've got quite a reputation, here 2000 years after you lived.

I'm glad you said what you did—asking to see the wounds for yourself. Many are the days I wish I could do the same.

We've followed your story through the years, sometimes leaning on you for proof of the presence of the Christ among us. I'll admit, it's still a little hard to imagine—that you experienced him in the flesh.

And yet... your story was carried forward by people who were utterly convinced he was among them. There's something in that conviction that keeps us paying attention. Well, that—and the way he lived: so full of love, offering a healing presence to everyone, no matter what.

We've also been told you carried that story far beyond where it began. I don't know how much of it we can verify. But I do know this: your voice has endured.

So, dear Thomas, thank you—for your questions, and for your witness. And for that moment when something in you recognized what you could not yet explain.

We'll be listening again for that this Sunday. Not to recreate your experience, but to notice where life might be meeting us, here and now.

Would you ever have guessed that a single moment of your life would be carried this far?

In gratitude,

Valerie
